The Werkcenter Model as a good practice of an activity model

Many people who have started dialysis or have had an organ transplant report wanting to return to work. Some patients with chronic kidney disease find that working out is good for them. For this reason, some of the patients continue to work full-time, while others try to adapt to part-time or flexible working conditions.

A dialysis patient has some expectations from his employer so that he can work in harmony with his workplace. The employer must allow dialysis and health visits and change the patient's work schedule. It is also expected to compensate for the time taken for medical reasons and to remove any physical limitations and, if possible, develop efficacy models for all..

A very good example of an activity model is the Werkcenter Model. This model consists of the following principles:

- One size fits all
- Sanction
- Participation
- Everyone can do something
- Work First / Work as Treatment: Real Work
- Reward – You should get paid if you work
- Business to Business
- Own Responsibility
- Local and regional Entrepreneurship strategy of municipalities/councils: National government forced them to act as an initiative

Small beautiful city Leiden

The city, which is 15 minutes from Schiphol airport and 30 minutes from Amsterdam center by train, was wonderful with its green streets, low-rise buildings and pink pavements, away from the noise of the big city. It also offered the participants the opportunity to taste various world cuisines. It was a truly great and intimate experience.

Leiden is a very photographic city with families of ducks wandering over the canals and its inhabitants on bicycles and windmills.

Who knows, maybe Participants will get a chance to revisit for Pro-CKD II in the future opportunities!
